His second-round match against Marcel Granollers didn't begin until 2 p.m. CT. He was at his locker barely 30 minutes later when reporters started to gather in the practice court. In the years when he was ready to make a deep run in a major, Djokovic always seemed to play as if the U.S. Open had been scheduled for the weekend immediately following Wimbledon. Today was no different. After missing six days last week with a hip injury, Djokovic played Sunday with a perfect left hip and his latest shoulder injury, which, as with the others, was to his top arm. It wasn't until Monday morning that the injury was examined by a team of doctors, and he was placed on a bike Sunday night to test the bone, which was in pretty good shape but would make for a tight, difficult match. He declined an on-court interview that day and didn't address the media until the middle of the second set. He mentioned only a few specifics, saying he was tested and not examined and that he had a surgically repaired right ankle. And so, by the time the match was on the court, the Internet had compiled a more full list of his injuries: four surgeries this year and some lingering issues from the 2014 U.S. Open, where he spent four hours in the locker room after the final against Stan Wawrinka before deciding he could play. When Djokovic was asked if it was hard to switch gears all the time, the answer was
